Concentration of the striking force on the mines resulting in higher than normal labour and material costs. The average monthly wages of miners during the eighties were the highest of any decade and with the recovery the year ended with wage scale of $ 3. 49.. A clause of the conditions of employment was added in the spring of 1920 : " The obligation of this organization for all its members includes the guarantee of a wage of $ 3.25 for all men employed by us in all its oregon mines.... " Wage increases will be granted to all members at regular intervals during the time they may be on this wage scale and later on the newly established wage scale of $ 3.50. " The wage rates which we will pay to our members in the future, as we shall determine from time to time, shall be such as will not effect the rate of advance of all other mines of like grade in oregon.... Should the wage scales of other oregon mines be lowered as a result of the work of this organization, in order to compel this organization to pay wage scales in excess of the usual average wage rates then obtaining, or should the wage scales of this organization be raised to compel these other oregon mines to pay a wage rate not higher than the average oregon wages then prevailing, we will deduct from the earnings of our members at least the cost of the increase in the wage scales of the other oregon mines. ... "We will not, however, compel any decrease in the wages of any other mining organization..... " THE OREGON MINES The Portland area of the Oregon mines in the early eighties was divided into approximately seventy - five separate field units of different grades. Most of these fields were entirely self - sustaining and although the total number of workers employed was as high as 120,000, the number in each field was small. There were some thirty - three fields where gold and silver were found between the main line and the angle branches of the lin. The fields were held by the Oregon Mining Association in the name of the working miners.
