The up to date Resource Directory, Marketplace, and Forum are always included as part of the download. Most downloads are small in size for instant access to the forum. "Video decompression software" seems like a trivial keyword, but there was no tool out there that could handle my 1080p/24 files without that killer new brain. Upon downloading the "Software Geiger Counter" manually, I found out what I was in for. RIP 1080HD had already been dead for months, and this. This is the conclusion of the Science and Cities report released today by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) and the International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN). The report acknowledges that 60-100 million people could be at risk by 2100 from rising sea levels, storm surges and increased flooding, with some 13-30 million people displaced within the city boundaries. "Our cities are home to over half of the world's population and much of their biodiversity. They are also exposed to climate change. Urban ecosystems have a huge diversity of habitats, from parks and rivers to skyscrapers, but when climate change impacts on the ecosystems, important roles are played by urban green spaces and wetlands. If these habitats are destroyed, the impact of climate change will be devastating, both for people and wildlife," said Dr Rosemary Gillespie, Chair of the IPCC Working Group II and Vice President, IUCN. "Urban wetlands can be reclaimed, biodiversity can be restored and human displacement averted by building climate-resilient cities. We must ensure that cities are not left in the lurch, but are equipped with the knowledge, scientific expertise and financial resources to adapt to a warmer world and to protect the world's cities." Most of the people affected by sea level rise and coastal storm surge will be in Asia and Africa. The report stresses that sea level rise is already occurring, based on the observations of many agencies around the world and its projections for the future. Even if the world today follows the low emissions pathway, the authors of the report are optimistic that a simple and effective adaptation approach, based on integrated coastal management, can be used to reduce the risk of future displacement. "Our cities are not invincible - in fact, many noble trees planted about 10 years ago outside our home. The previous owners were very fond of them so it's no wonder they dug in right to the soil, but I've had problems with them since day 1, they have bare roots everywhere, about to strip out and die. They've been left undisturbed for ten years and I don't want to mulch them with a thick layer of leaves, I've thinned them and have had leaves removed around the root zone, but still they seem to die easily. Any ideas? A: They're probably thirsty. The near-constant mist will be depositing much more water than they need, and some of that water will flow directly into the roots and perish them. As a stopgap, you can place bricks over the exposed dirt, weigh them down with rocks, or cover the exposed dirt with wire-spaced double-sided tape (non-toxic). This will keep the water off the dirt, and the roots will grow through it. The best solution is to remove the water all-around the tree, or in general for the plants. (As @samrails says, it's not a good idea to leave bare dirt under plants in high-rainfall areas.) They'll get all the water they can use from the drought-resistant soil beneath the soil of their beds, and a layer of mulch will be placed over the exposed roots. A: My first thought would be water demand. This is a good reference site for the transpiration rate of various plants:

Bare-rooted trees commonly have the lowest water needs. Annuals and perennials with dense foliage have higher requirements. If leaves are removed by insects or mites, the plants become more susceptible to drought. These trees were probably grown in clay soil, which is better for allowing water into the root zone than sandy soil. Many plants not only
