people are homeless or "foreigners" in their own country. This "foreigner" subgroup lies somewhere between the core group of native-born Americans and immigrants, although they are often treated like second-class citizens. According to the 2010 U.S. Census Bureau estimate, there were around 14,683,000 U.S. citizens living in homeless shelters, medical clinics, etc. This number is 2% of the total U.S. population. In the 1990s, the National Coalition for the Homeless and the U.S. General Accounting Office estimated there were around 820,000 homeless children in the United States. One fourth of these children were also classified as "foreigners." This is an astonishing statistic when you consider that the U.S. has the highest number of military troops on the planet, and that around 800,000 of these troops live in the United States. Moreover, many of these soldiers are children. They are the homeless offspring of destitute parents who join the military out of economic desperation. Over 200,000 homeless U.S. military children are housed in military barracks, orphanages, or living with other military families. Another 220,000 homeless U.S. military children are housed in homeless shelters, soup kitchens, or are illegally living in the nation's garages, attics, and basements. These figures do not include millions of homeless children who are co-existing with migrant workers, immigrant families, and inner-city households, as well as those who are living outside U.S. borders. America has never led in providing basic human rights. Most of the human rights violations in this country fall under six different "rights" categories. These are as follows: Freedom of speech and free press. By the 2000 census, less than 2% of the entire U.S. population has access to a television set and less than 1% has access to a personal computer. This leaves approximately 99.8% of the population without basic communication outlets. The main reason for this is due to the savage consolidation of media ownership in the early part of the 20th century, which was further reinforced by the Supreme Court's infamous Smith v. California (1955) decision. Freedom of association. This right is almost completely non-existent in the U.S., as associations such as the NAACP are forbidden to sue on behalf of their members, who are systematically prosecuted under the law. The court

What does a typical Linux Software Center look like? Does it have a small footprint? Has it been designed to be fast and efficient to browse? In this article, I will review a not-yet-released version of the Software Center that comes with the GNOME Desktop Environment. When it's released, I will compare it to a well-established solution: the Ubuntu Software Center. What are the main features of the Software Center? The Software Center is a software application which allows the user to browse software available for installation on the system. It is mostly similar to the Debian package system; in Ubuntu, however, it uses a similar repository system, but it is called a Meta Packages Index. The Software Center includes a few extra features, including: Search A search feature that allows you to browse for applications by search terms, category, or rating. Support for multi-language Like the Ubuntu Software Center, the GNOME Software Center supports multiple languages for the search, so you can browse for apps in multiple languages. Free software support The Software Center ensures that you have the freedom to modify, adapt, and share the software that you install. Multi-platform support The Software Center is available on GNOME for desktop systems and GNOME 3.2 for mobile devices. GTK+ extension support New functionality is in the works to allow the GNOME Software Center to use GTK+ widgets. Searching for software To search for software, click on the Search icon on the toolbar: Screenshot: Searching for software When the search field is active, you can type in the search field to search for an app by name or category: Screenshot: Searching for software You can change the search order by clicking on one of the icons on the right: Screenshot: Searching for software The order of the list changes accordingly to your choices.
